Now in its 12th Summer, Shakespeare at Winedale is an academic course offered through the Department of English, College of Liberal Arts, at The University of Texas at Austin. Students selected for the course through an application-interview process during the spring months register for both summer terms at The University of Texas at Austin. During the preparatory phase (the first six-weeks), each student works independently on the assigned plays, reading and comparing texts, scholarship and criticism, and source material; and writing three papers.

During the second summer term (this year from July 9-August 23) students live in the Winedale area at Festival Hill in Round Top, Texas, and study Shakespeare 15-18 hours a day, for 46 days. Shakespeare at Winedale is an intense, thorough enterprise, demanding the most of each student's physical, intellectual, imaginative, and emotional energies.

Shakespeare at Winedale asks students to study the play through performance. Once at Winedale, students examine every aspect of three Shakespearean plays: word by word, sound by sound, image by image, and the act of performance. Every session is “live” in the sense that it is performed and not rehearsed. There are no rehearsals at Winedale, only great performances, approached, hopefully, with intelligence and imagination and an understanding of Shakespeare’s theatricality. The improvisational work with the text not only leads the students toward understanding and experiencing the act of “play,” it also teaches them much about role-playing, self-portraits, the relationships between life and art which Hamlet and Shakespeare before him knew rather well.

Shakespeare at Winedale is an opportunity for any college or university student in the United States to explore Shakespeare in this special way. Preference in selection is given to students who have never before performed or read Shakespeare.

This 1982 summer of Shakespeare at Winedale is dedicated to Burdine and Jack Johnson and Charlotte and Alec Rhodes.
